Mr R goes on about: Partnership

Hello again, it's been a while since I last put something in the newsletter.

Having worked in several schools over the years, I have seen variations of the partnership between school and home. I believe at Scarning our partnership is one of the stronger ones and also that we can make it even better.

What do I mean when I say partnership though? It isn't just encouraging and supporting children with their learning and homework, or listening to them read as often as possible, incredibly important as these things are.

It is also the 'soft' skills that are not measured by tests or Ofsted. These include our school values such as kindness and respect for all; growing a positive attitude to learning, building the resilience to accept we can be wrong or make mistakes and not to give up in the face of difficulty. Everyone at Scarning aims to model these every day around the school.

As a result, children are exposed to these vital life skills for six hours every day. However, this is only a quarter of the day. Reinforcing these outside of school can greatly help a child's ability to progress academically and socially, leading them to gain even more from their time with us and be well prepared for the next chapter of their journey.

When we all "pull on the rope", we can move mountains.

Until next time, Mr R.
